Q: Bash Script Syntax Error I am new to bash and can't figure out what is wrong with this script. I have no errors but it doesn't seem to run correctly. I want to make a directory called old(hence the use of the 'old' alias) and then run a couple of other bash scripts

It works well and can be used to good effect in small to medium sized projects. The problem is that maintaining it becomes so tedious it is no longer a good option to extend it. (I am not sure if I am using this right term?). For example I have a base class which contains a few static utilities and the template of the views of the classes inheriting from it. `public abstract class BaseClass { public static string GetString() { return "[" + ResourceManager.GetType().Name + "]"; } public static string GetDefaultViewTemplate() { return BaseClass.GetString(); } }` The view-template above is called by all the views in the app to generate the first line of the page header as well as the footer. In case I were to add a new column in the database, instead of a bunch of c# code I only need to add a new static utility to the BaseClass. I then also need to add a new method to the header and footer. I did not like having to repeat all these methods in each class. I therefore tried to create a new ViewTemplate as follows: `public class AutoMaintainedClass { public static string GetDefaultViewTemplate() { return BaseClass.GetString(); } }` I then used the Auto

Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a method and apparatus for confirming the completion of post-molding drying of a lithium polymer secondary cell casing and to a lithium polymer secondary cell comprising the casing. 2. Description of the Related Art Lithium polymer secondary cells are small in size and light in weight and have a high capacity, and thus are used for the power source of portable electronic equipment. Usually, a lithium polymer secondary cell comprises a cylindrical casing formed by rolling a metal foil having a certain thickness and a pair of electrodes arranged in a space formed in the casing. However, the case is required to be produced at a high speed in order to reduce the costs of the casing. In order to obtain a thin, light-weight casing at a high speed, the adhesive strength between the casing and the foil is greatly reduced. If the adhesive strength is not reduced sufficiently, the casing may be peeled off from the metal foil. In a method of producing a lithium polymer secondary cell, therefore, it is necessary to confirm whether a lithium polymer secondary cell with its casing adhered to a metal foil is peeled off and fails to bring out a predetermined amount of electricity. A known technique for confirming the adhesive strength of a lithium polymer secondary cell casing to a metal foil is an ultrasonic test in which a signal is transmitted from the casing side to the metal foil side by applying an ultrasonic wave thereto. This technique is disclosed, for example, in Japanese Laid-Open Patent Publication No. 8-336528. The conventional ultrasonic test is for confirming that a predetermined amount of electricity can be drawn out from the casing with the metal foil ad
