Pollen grains and seed coats of living gymnosperms vary in shape and sometimes display a remarkable variability in morphology in the different parts of the same species. Such characteristics are thought to have developed under selective pressures induced by the environment. The aim of this paper is to explore the hypothesis that such variations may be, to a substantial degree, the consequence of physical forces. In this discussion it is shown that pollen grain and seed coat shape differ among species because of the competing mechanical effects of surface tension and the elastic properties of the cell wall. This includes growth mode and cell mechanics in the pollen grain and the tension exerted on the epidermis of the seed coat. Based on these principles, we develop a theoretical model to explore how forces generated in different parts of a growing pollen grain will affect the overall grain shape. The shape variation observed in pollen grains and seed coats of living gymnosperms is naturally linked to the geometry and growth of these organs. Therefore, the evolutionary pattern of pollen shape is closely linked to that of the plants of which the pollen
