"FIFA 22 has a much faster pace. We can react very quickly to the game situations," said Aaron McHardy, producer of FIFA for EA Sports. "Because of our new game engine and the new human performance technology, we are able to deliver a more realistic-looking simulation for players to experience." The ball travels through a new physics engine that reacts and responds to player movements with a level of realism that is previously unseen in sports games. For example, the ball will change direction when a player is running, and change direction when a player jumps and kicks the ball. With this new advanced physics engine, the ball can predict behaviour and predict where it will go. Other effects include shot deflection as well as real deceleration from the ball when it hits the ground. It's as close as any simulation we have seen to what it feels like to have a football experience in your living room. We are making it happen in FIFA. "We are using our work on player character animations, physiology and more to tackle challenges such as player collisions and interaction between them and the ball, as well as developing player behaviour. "As a result, the most complex aspects of the game simulation are being improved while also maintaining a dynamic and authentic experience. FIFA 22 will be the most advanced sports game ever made on console." In previous years FIFA has taken a first-person perspective. We're taking this to a whole new level. The vision is a third-person experience that captures movements and focuses on individual player skill. The improvements in gameplay combine with new narrative and presentation tools. Adding to the depth of FIFA 22 is the ability to interact with the action in real time. You can take part in the game without dropping into a commentary box. It's like a champion-driven narrative experience, showing you the action in your own time, with your own reactions and your own decisions. "We are using a mix of methods to deliver a complete and immersive football experience. We're also taking a step forward in the presentation of the player models, using all the advanced technologies we've worked on to deliver a next-gen experience." FIFA 22 was created by a team of over 300 EA Sports developers, led by Aaron McHardy and Aaron Schechter, producer of FIFA. EA Tiburon, the EA Sports development studio, is located in San Francisco, California.
