A 9-year-old girl with headache, vomiting, and lethargy was found to have isobutyryl-CoA dehydrogenase (EC 1.3.99.9) deficiency, an inborn error of valine metabolism. During an acid-base perturbation, serum amino acid concentrations remained high, which indicated that leucine oxidation remained active, but the normalization of the respiratory quotient and the plasma concentration of ketone bodies, ketoacid analogs that are formed by oxidation of 3-hydroxybutyrate, indicated a relative blockage of the isobutyryl pathway. Wind Energy: The path forward for the Peruvian wind industry Peru is a small emerging wind market, with consistent development of wind capacity in the past decade. This trend continues this year, driven by several important government and industry changes, and a change in the Law of Renewable Energy Sources. Radiografias Peru is a small emerging wind market, with consistent development of wind capacity in the past decade. This trend continues this year, driven by several important government and industry changes, and a change in the Law of Renewable Energy Sources. Recently wind capacity increased to 11.2 GW or 11.9% of total installed capacity. New power from wind generation keeps adding capacity to the grid.

However, the speed of this growth is slowing, as capacity in the grid nears 10 GW. The recent policy changes can be described as an attempt to increase competitiveness among existing wind and hydro power generation, as well as to increase support for new wind generation. Although some of the measures are still in place, in the rest of this post we will describe how these measures could drive future growth of wind power. The first important change regards the legal framework. The current law for renewable energy sources (Ley de Fuentes Renovables), LRF+, was passed in 2016, and started to enter into effect last year. Within this framework, the Ministry of Energy has established important incentives to stimulate wind generation capacity. In 2018, the Wind Law in Peru
