Conventional dressings and therapeutic infusions of skin wounds have many drawbacks, which together with the absence of healing capacity of chronic wounds, point out the need for new therapeutic approaches. Cell-based therapies are now a major focus for regeneration of skin and other tissues, and in the case of skin wounds, are seen as a means of directly repairing the dermal layer. Intradermal cell transplantation holds promise for more precise delivery and containment of the cells, as well as for reducing their contact with undecomposed collagenous scaffold materials (such as autografts, homografts, xenografts, and allografts). Current clinical investigations of this cell-based approach have utilized autologous cells based on the rationale that autologous cells would be preferable over allogeneic and xenogeneic cells which may harbor immunogenic antigens. This strategy of autologous cells has therefore been the subject of many recent studies that demonstrate the feasibility of the approach. Despite a great deal of clinical success, the actualization of clinical benefits from this therapy will depend upon several factors including the nature and origin of the cells used, and their ability to function in the complex microenvironment of a mature wound site. The optimization of these parameters will require a better understanding of the fate of transplanted cells at the site of repair. Although some studies have shown the presence of host cells within the wounds, the nature and identity of these cells as well as their ability to fulfill reparative functions has not been examined extensively in vivo. There remains a need in the art for additional compositions and methods for the treatment of skin wounds, particularly chronic wounds.
