in healthy bone tissue, the bone cells move to the place where a fracture occurs. the body makes new cells, called blood cells, which are bone-like. the blood cells fill in the cavity in the bone and help to support the area. a cast is a splint that holds a broken bone in place so it does not move. every bone has two ends: a long, thin end called the diaphysis (or the shaft of the bone) and a round end called the epiphysis (or the head of the bone). the most common break in the bones of the upper arm occurs in the end of the humerus, where the radius, ulna, and a small bone on the upper arm meet. the area in the bone where this break occurs is called a fracture. if you have arthritis of the thumb, it is crucial to get the thumb pain or joint pain remedied. people with arthritis of the thumb often experience pain in the thumb and wrist. you can't differentiate pain from the thumb from pain in your wrist. arthritis of the thumb is quite different from arthritis of the wrist, as the thumb bones are bigger than the bones in the wrist. the thumb and wrist bones also have different shapes than one another, so doctors often determine if one pain is due to arthritis of the thumb or the wrist by carefully inspecting the wrist with a hand brace on. this serves as a protective shield for the wrist bones. arthritis is a chronic disease, meaning that symptoms do not improve with time. without treatment, the joints and surrounding tissues become less flexible and are more likely to get stiff and painful. if not treated, the joints and bones become less flexible, more likely to become deformed and eventually destroyed.

depending on the underlying cause of the pain, your physician may suggest anti-inflammatory medications. not all medications used to treat arthritis cause patients to feel pain. the use of corticosteroids or medications that are known as non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs (nsaids) are the most common medications used for the treatment of arthritis. nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drugs are also used to treat the pain of other disorders. however, do not take over the counter medications without consulting your physician to determine if this is truly the solution for your pain. if the tendon cannot properly attach to the bone, the tendon may separate from the bone or disconnect from the bone. this can occur with repetitive stress on the wrist from a job that requires repetitive activity. plantar fasciitis is a pain in the heel, or a burning pain in the bottom of your foot or leg that occurs when you are standing or walking. if you have pain in the bottom of your foot when you stand, it is likely a tendonitis problem. plantar fasciitis is thought to be a problem of the plantar fascia ligament, which runs from the heel to the toes. plantar fasciitis can occur with ankle sprains and is often treated with corticosteroid injections. it is often a problem with the fascia, not just with the ligament. a rupture of the tibialis anterior tendon is a tear of the muscle tendon connecting the calf muscle to the foot. the foot tends to lock and the foot and toes point inward as the foot flexes. the symptoms of this injury are ankle pain, pain at the bottom of the heel and sudden foot pain when the foot is in the proper position. this is often caused by a sudden change in the activity level of the person, like taking on stairs.
