
Men Of War Vietnam Trainer 1.00.1

While the project strategies and the implementation approach will be the focus of the final chapter, I start with a deeper analysis of the pedagogical model behind the Swedish media aid projects, which were aimed at fostering journalism in Vietnamese media and providing a journalism education. The planning process for the projects and the partnership in Vietnam were informed by a set of assumptions, which constitutes Swedish journalism ideology, about journalists and the task of journalism. From a deconstructive perspective, I will examine and critique the Swedish media aid program according to the concept of the media ideology and its consequences for journalists and Vietnamese citizens. In this paper, I take the perspective of students and practitioners of journalism at the University of Gothenburg, who participated in the media aid projects and the consequence, both positive and negative, for journalism in Vietnam. The findings demonstrate how the implemented project strategies reflected Swedish media ideology and were received differently by the participants. Ultimately, the Swedish media aid projects and the pedagogical model in Vietnam resulted in changes in journalism in Vietnam and journalism in Swedish. This paper does not provide any new theories. I started by defining two broad concepts: media ideology and media pedagogy and media ideology . The research of this study was based on a specific period of time, between 1993 and 2007, and a restricted geographic region that was the Western part of Vietnam. It consisted of several steps, which can be found in the introduction. Part of the research was based on interviews with the Swedish trainers that participated in the projects, and other information was gathered from different sources. The data was analyzed in close cooperation between the main researcher and a research assistant, and parts of the text have been drawn on their expertise in the research domain. It is a qualitative study, and the presented material is based on textual sources that cannot be verified, even though the materials have been used in collaboration with other researchers. The underlying theoretical framework used in the study is a combination of Josephi's (2010) methodological framework for media research, and Fredrickson and Loscocco's (1998) representation of pedagogy .
